29 years ago, a boy and a girl were born at the same time in a village on the shores of the Lake Van. A wise old man, Setrak, visits both families and tells the parents that the babies are meant to share the same destiny: "They will love each other deeply. But something terrible will happen, and they will part ways," he said.

Years pass by, Selma and Mihran grow up, and they really fall in love just like the old man said. The two are engaged to marry but before their wedding day, a fire breaks out in Van, in which Mihran loses his house and all his belongings. Selma is blamed for starting the fire, and just as Setrak predicted, the relationship ends, with Mihran moving to Istanbul with his family. Since the day he left, Selma and Mihran haven't exchanged a word. But when Setrak dies, leaving a mysterious inheritance to Selma and Mihran in Istanbul, she is forced to travel across the country to reunite with her childhood love...

Selma hops in the car to Istanbul with her little sister Leylim and their cat. While she has gotten used to a humble life, Mihran is living life to the fullest in Istanbul, and is about to get engaged to the beautiful Alya. Selma finds him, tells him about their inheritance, and how they can only claim it if they go together to see a lawyer. But to their horror, they find out that all they've been left with is an old, wrecked house, that can't be used without investing a lot of money in it. Selma, who was desperately hoping to sell the house because she is broke, is disappointed, but determined to make things work out for herself and her sister.

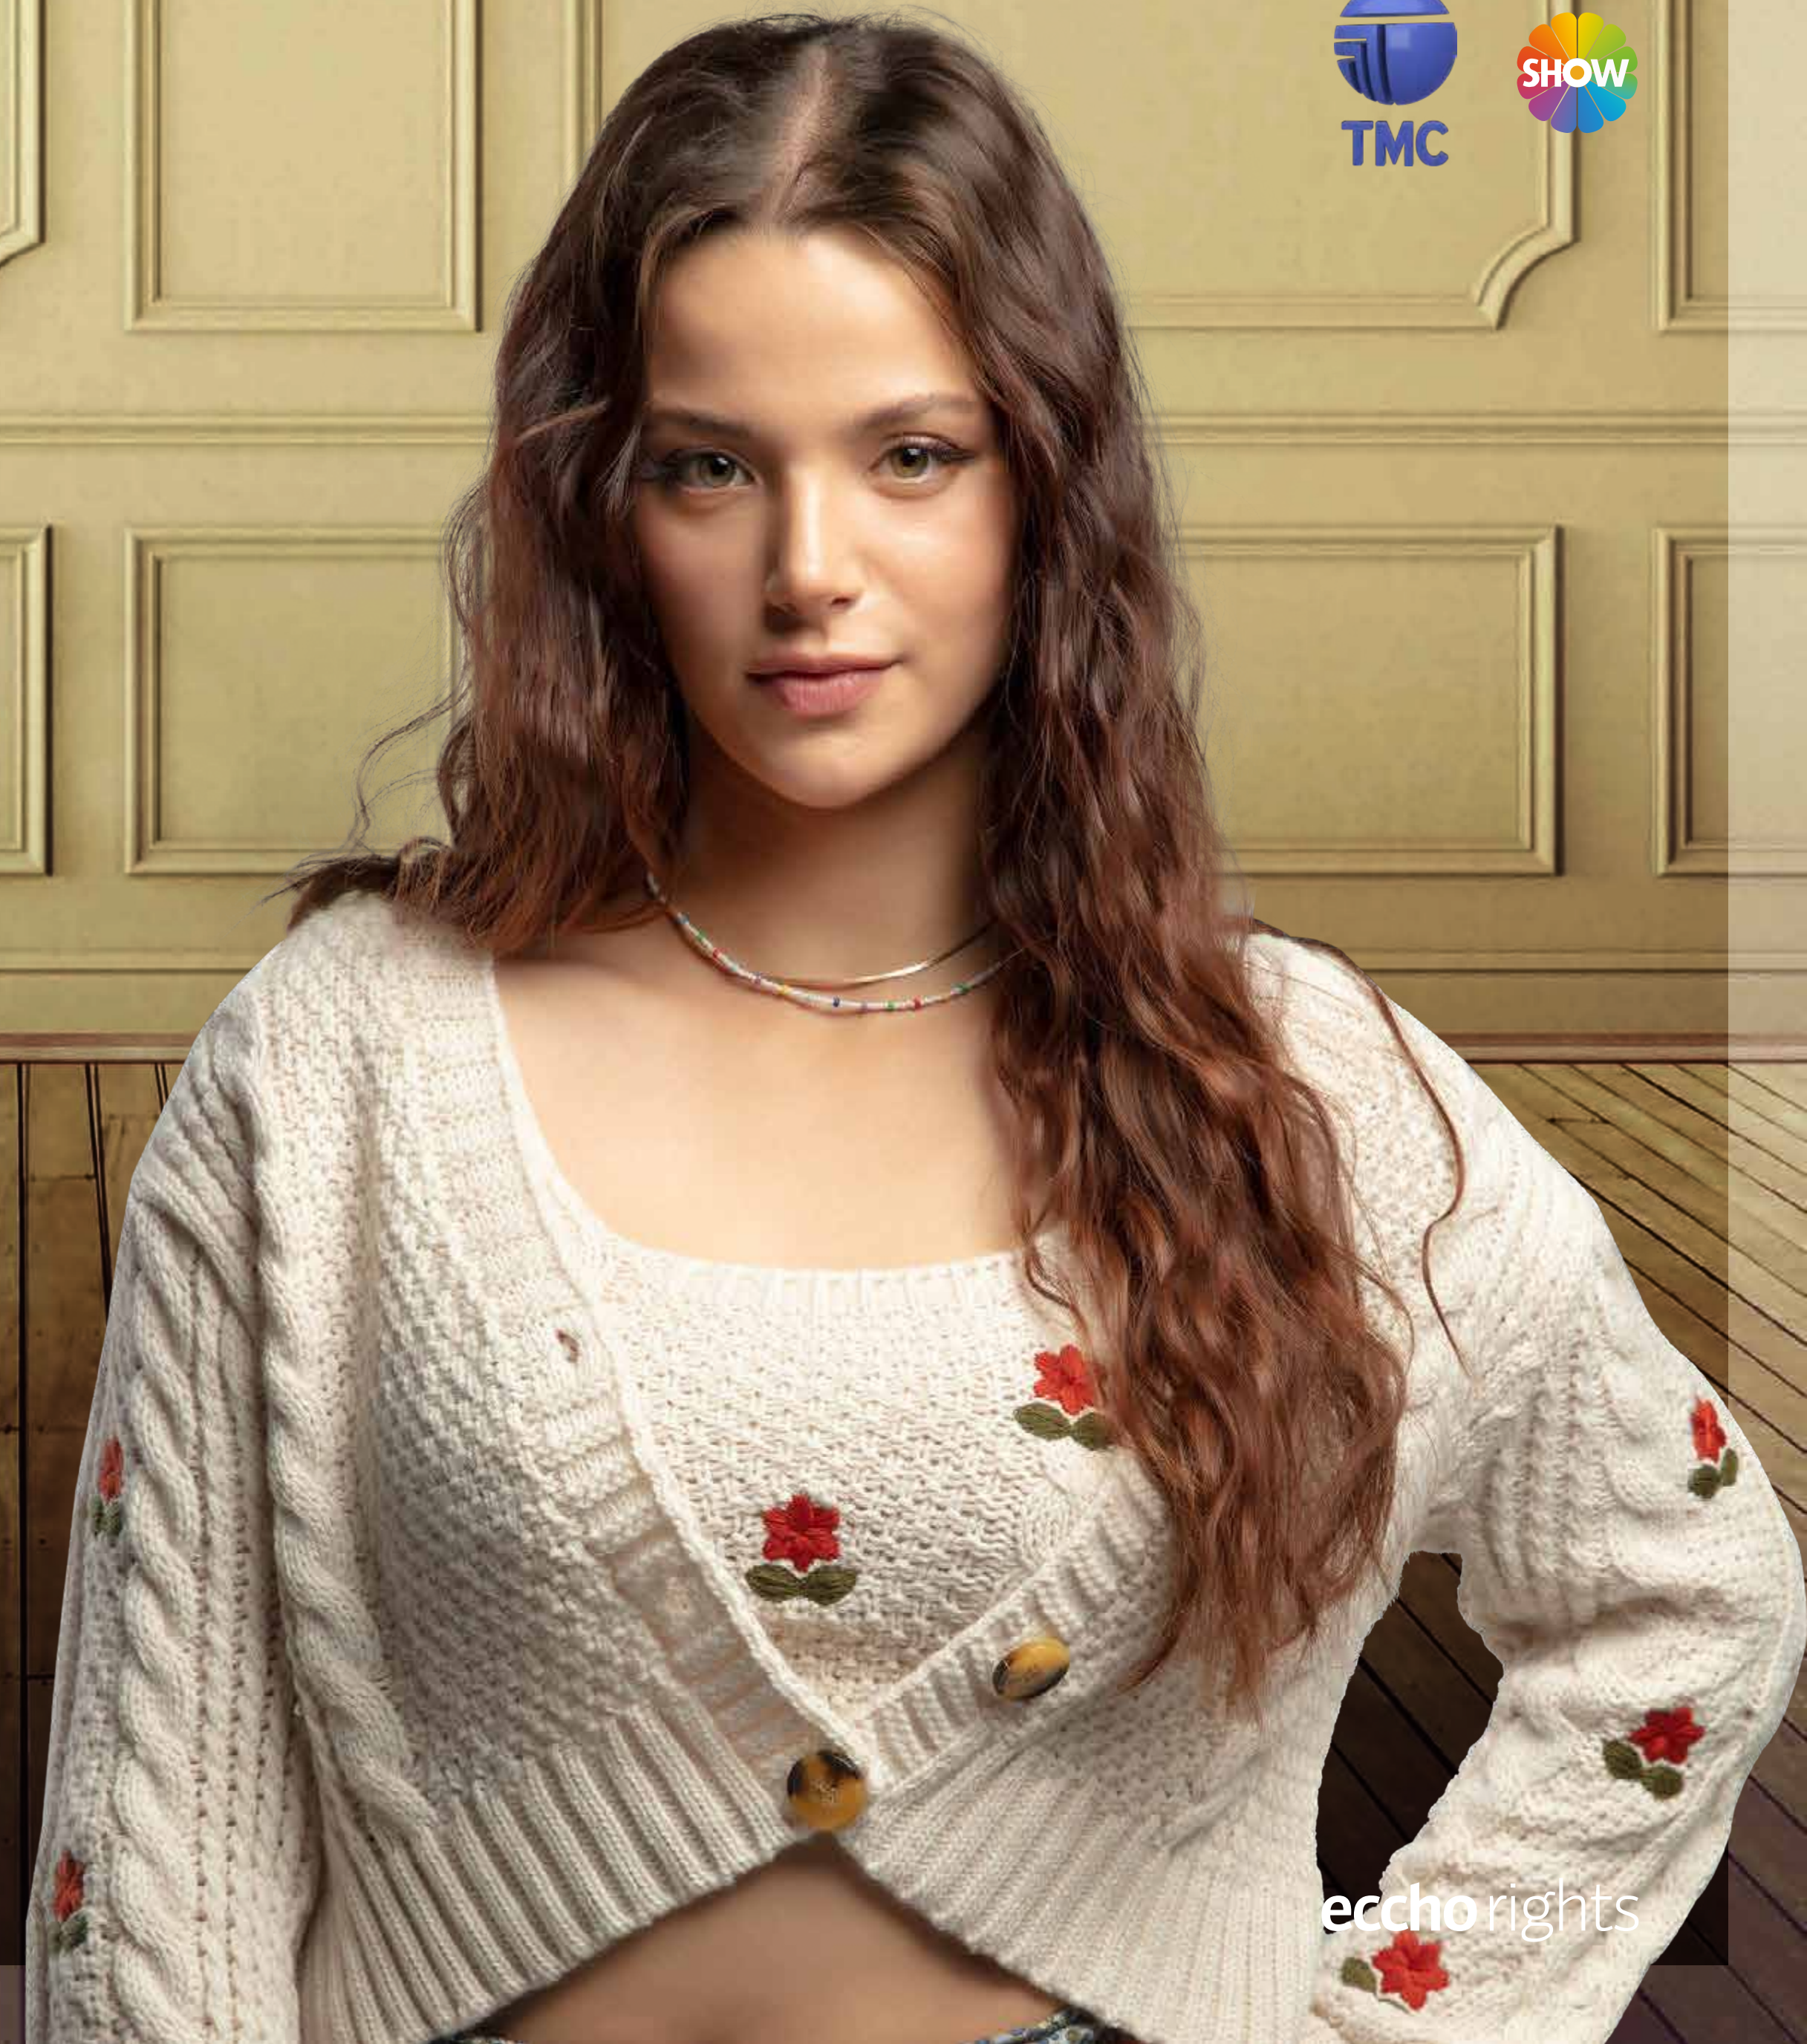

Time goes by and eventually, as the wise Setrak once said, it appears that Selma and Mihran really do share the same destiny, with their lives inevitably intertwined. And while it wasn't part of his prediction, after the long separation, a new romance is kindling between the two, one that they can not resist...
